GARDEN CITY HARVEST

MISSOULA · MONTANA

2016 marked 20 years that Garden City Harvest has built community through agriculture with and for our neighbors in need. We do this on 20 urban farms and gardens through our farm to school, youth development, community gardens, and neighborhood farm programs. We've found, over the years, that education, connection, and healing go along with farming and digging. So we've built programs that invite everyone—from vegetable CSA shareholders to teens to entire classrooms—to our farms and into our gardens to learn and grow with us. We meet people where they need us most: a healthy emergency grocery visit at the Missoula Food Bank, a place to dig in the dirt, a weekly share of veggies, a job, a field trip. We are a lifeline to health and wellbeing. We are here to help our community grow, feed, and inspire.

Gardening offers hope for what is to come. When I unexpectedly moved to Missoula last year, I was grieving the recent death of my son. As soon as I arrived I signed up for a community garden plot because I needed to grow something to heal. What I found surprised me: it provided the solace I sought, but it also invited me to put my own roots down into this community.

- BRIGID | roots

At first, Garden City Harvest literally meant a steady job. When they hired me, I was surfing couches and pretty much homeless. I loved feeling a part of something. I went back to the PEAS Farm every summer of high school. Those summers changed my life. I now have a steady, year-round job at Home Resource—I wouldn't have it without them.

- JESSE | a steady job

One of my favorite lessons from Farmer Amy was the one about hamburgers. We drew pictures of a cycle of how compost is made. First, they eat, then the cow manures, and then the farmer mixes hay into it and then makes compost and then the compost feeds the plants.

- IVORY | a farmer in my classroom

For me, it's about connection: to community, to place, to nature, and to something greater than myself. It's all like an extended family to me.

- GREG | good food for every body
